

GORKHALAND MOVEMENT

Ethnic Conflict and State Response

SWATAHSIDDHA SARKAR

Gorkhaland Movement

Ethnic Conflict and State Response

Swatahsiddha Sarkar

CONCEPT PUBLISHING COMPANY PVT. LTD.,
NEW DELHI-110059

Call No. 303.6 SAR 19
कॉल संख्या
Accession No. 9B-497
परिग्रहण संख्या

© Swatahsiddha Sarkar

All rights reserved. No part of this work may be reproduced, stored, adapted, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, micro-filming recording or otherwise, or translated in any language, without the prior written permission of the copyright owner and the publisher. The book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not, by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, resold, hired out, or otherwise circulated without the prior publisher's written consent in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published.

The views and opinions expressed in this book are author(s) own and the facts reported by him/her have been verified to the extent possible, and the publishers are not in any way liable for the same.

ISBN-13 : 978-93-5125-007-4

First Published 2013

Published and Printed by

Concept Publishing Company Pvt. Ltd.

A/15-16, Commercial Block, Mohan Garden

New Delhi-110059 (India)

T : 25351460, 25351794, F : 091-11-25357109

E: publishing@conceptpub.com, W: www.conceptpub.com

Editorial Office: H-13, Bali Nagar, New Delhi-110 015, India.

Cataloging in Publication Data--Courtesy: D.K. Agencies (P) Ltd. <docinfo@dkagencies.com>

Sarkar, Swatahsiddha, 1975-

Gorkhaland movement : ethnic conflict and state response / Swatahsiddha Sarkar.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references (p.) and index.

ISBN 9789351250074

1. Nepali people—India—Darjeeling (District)—Politics and government.
2. Gurkhas—India—Darjeeling (District)—Politics and government.
3. Darjeeling (India : District)—Politics and government.
4. Darjeeling (India : District)—History
5. Darjeeling (India : District)—Ethnic relations.
6. Gorkhaland Territorial Administration. I. Title.

Acknowledgements

The idea of the present book grew up out of my association with the CCRHS, New Delhi as a Fellow for the period 2010-11. Not to mention that the necessary funds needed for the completion of the present study were generously allocated by the CCRHS, New Delhi. I am thankful to the entire CCRHS fraternity, especially to Ms. Varsha Gewali, Ms. Meha Dixit, Mr. Faizan Ahmed and Mr. Sunil Gupta who took keen interest in the present work. The book came out initially as a project report of the CCRHS and I am thankful to the entire CCRHS team for allowing me publish the reworked version of the ~~project~~ report. Although, the work is financially assisted by the CCRHS, it does not reflect the viewpoint of the organization in anyway.

My departmental colleagues have helped me a lot by raising several critical points whenever I discussed issues with them. Prof. Sanjay K. Roy's contributions deserve special mention, who identified several debatable points raised in the present study and offered valuable suggestions to rework them. I am indebted to him. Field assistants like Kumar, Sophia, Karma, Smriti, and Pooja have taken the pains to complete the interviews of the informants and in collecting relevant data from the field. I am extremely thankful to them. Mr. Pintu Majumdar and Mr. Gour Gopal Barman have helped in data processing while Mr. Subir Das Mohanta gave the present effort a printable shape. I am grateful to all of them. I am also indebted to Dr. Madhumita Sen, Dr. Debaprasad Chatterjee and Dr. Jyotiprasad Chatterjee for their enriching comments and constructive criticisms offered on the occasion of one of my presentations held at Maulana Azad College, Kolkata in the recent past.

No word of thankfulness can be sufficient for the contribution that Mrs. Basnet of Darjeeling has made by giving me the opportunity to consult some of the rarest Government documents which have been profitably used in the present study. Satyadeep, Dibyendu and Anjan have stimulated critical nods in my thought as always. I am obliged to them. Last but not the least in the list of acknowledgement my respondents are there to whom I am immensely obliged. It is they who have given me time, even amidst their busy schedule, to discuss on issues of my purpose. It is because of their cooperation and help I have been able to incorporate the 'field view' in the present study.

I am also grateful to Mr. Ashok Kumar Mittal of Concept Publishing Co. Pvt. Ltd., New Delhi-110059, who took keen interest in my work and even patiently allowed me to incorporate the postscript and some necessary reworking in the text.

However, for analytical inconsistency, thematical guilt or incorrect data, if any, none other than me is responsible.

Siliguri, Darjeeling
August 28, 2012

Swatahsiddha Sarkar

Contents

Acknowledgements	vii
List of Tables	xiii
List of Figures	xiv
1. Introduction	1
• The Context	6
• Methodological Concerns	8
• Chapter Outline	12
2. Towards Sociology of Conflict Resolution: Themes and Perspectives	14
• Ending Ethnic Conflict: Options for Negotiation	15
• Conflict Settlement: Approaches and Strategies	18
• Ancient Hatred (AH)	22
• Manipulative Elites (ME)	23
• Security Dilemma (SD)	23
• Economic Roots (ER)	24
• Conflict Settlement: Theories	26
• Consociationalism	27
• Centripetalism	28
• Power Dividing	29
• Conflict Settlement in Practice: Indian Scenario	31
• Assessment of the Statist Approach and the Need for a Societal Perspective	34
• Towards a Sociological Perspective of Ethnic Conflict and Conflict Resolution	36
• Sociology of Ethnic Conflict: Beyond Elitist Perspective	38

3. Movement and State Response: Colonial and Post-Colonial Arrangement in Darjeeling Hills	41
• Colonial Governmentality and the Exclusion of Nepalis	41
• Locating the Nepalis in Post-Colonial Nation State: 'Exclusionary Logic' of Nationalism	44
• Techniques of Inclusion: Post-Colonial Indian Nation State and Darjeeling	47
• Constituent Assembly Debates and the Concern for Darjeeling	48
• States Reorganisation Commission (SRC) and Darjeeling District	51
• Nepali Language Movement and the Response of the State	52
• Regional Autonomy in Darjeeling Hills	56
• Election and Electoral Politics	58
• Democratic Aptitude of the Hills: The Field View	64
4. Movement and State Response: Gorkhaland in the 1980s	69
• The Turbulent Phase of the Movement	70
• The Track Record of Violence: Gorkhaland Movement in the Mid 1980s	73
5. Movement and State Response: Gorkhaland in Post-DGHC Period	82
• The Rise and Fall of Council Mode of Governance	82
• Greater Nepal Fiasco	84
• No Man's Land Thesis	85
• Gorkhaland as Bottled Genie	86
• Sixth Schedule Status for Darjeeling: Initial Efforts and Reactions	88
• Darjeeling-Sikkim Merger	90
6. Movement and State Response: Gorkhaland in Contemporary Period	94
• Gorkha Janmukti Morcha: The New Hope?	95
• Gorkha-Adivasi Unity in Dooars: The Initial Efforts	98
• The Beginning of Another New Arrangement: Gorkhaland Territorial Administration (GTA)	101

• The Composition of GTA	102
• Power and Functions of GTA	104
• Objectives of GTA	105
• Provisions for Touzi Department in the New Arrangement	107
• Provisions for Panchayati Raj Institutions in the GTA	109
• The Idea of Development and the GTA	111
• Autonomous Council and the Notion of Community	112
• Inclusion of Territories and the GTA	114
7. In Lieu of a Conclusion	123
Postscript
Gorkhaland Territorial Administration: Towards Implementation	138
• High Power Committee (HPC) Report : A Synoptic Overview	142
• The Criteria of Area Identification Followed by the HPC	143
• Approach	150
• Functioning of the HPC	152
• GTA Sabha Election	155
• Formation of GTA	164
Appendices
I. Chronology of Gorkhaland Movement	170
II. Text of the Memorandum of Agreement Gorkhaland Territorial Administration (GTA)	188
III. Gorkhaland Territorial Administration (GTA) & Darjeeling Gorkha Hill Council (DGHC): A Comparative Analysis	202
IV. Gorkhaland Territorial Administration and Bodoland Territorial Council (BTC): A Comparative Analysis	205
V. A Comparative Analysis of Allocated Departments/ Subjects/Offices under the DGHC, GAA, GTA, and BTC	207
Bibliography	214
Index	222

List of Tables

2.1:	Basic Concepts of Conflict Containment	17
2.2:	Conflict Resolution: Conceptual Framework	25
2.3:	Synoptic view of the Models of Conflict Settlement	30
2.4:	Oommen's framework of state response to social movement	33
2.5:	Ethnic Conflicts and State Response: Empirical Findings	35
3.1:	Showing the change of Nepali language speakers (%) in different Census decades (1911-61)	55
4.1:	Official statement regarding human casualties occurred during Gorkhaland movement	74
4.2:	Official statement regarding the plundering of property happened during Gorkhaland movement	75
6.1:	Fact-file of the rise of Bimal Gurung and the GJM	96
6.2:	Information on Land of Tea Gardens (in acres) in Darjeeling District	108
6.3:	Status of Lease of Tea Gardens in Darjeeling Hills	108
P1:	Classification of 723 petitions as per their contents and decisions taken thereof by the HPC	144
P2:	List of Mouzas claimed by the GJM from Dooars-Terai Region	146
P3:	GTA Sabha Elections 2012 Result	158
P4:	Executive Body Members of the GTA and the distribution of portfolio	165

List of Figures

1.1:	Proposed Map of Gorkhaland	7
3.1:	Assembly Election Performance of Political Parties in Darjeeling Hills (1952-2011)	60
3.2:	Lok Sabha seats won by different political parties during 1957-2009	62
6.1:	The Composition: A Comparison between DGHC and GTA	103
6.2:	Siliguri Municipal Corporation Map and the Wards claimed by the GJM	115
6.3:	Extended Map of Gorkhaland showing the areas claimed by the GJM	117

now proliferated in those regions of the world, which remained largely outside the purview of ethnic upsurge earlier. Ethnic identity issues now stirred not only the so-called developed countries like Canada, United Kingdom, Spain, France, and the United States but also in the former Communist countries too. Ethnic and racial cleavages have now become a part of the global political landscape (Jalali & Lipset. 1992-93:586). (Indeed, there has been an ethnic revival throughout the globe, which showed that the clashes the modern political systems are experiencing with, are more cultural and civilizational rather than economic, political or ideological (Huntington, 1997: 21).)

Besides being a global issue of concern, ethnic conflicts and movements are gaining momentous growth in South Asian political landscape in general and in countries like India, in particular. It is no exaggeration to put that post-independent Indian politics is torn between politics of identity and politics of culture. Gorkha bid for a homeland, among others articulated on the pretext of language, culture, community, and region within Indian union has been a recurrent theme of India's national politics for quite some time now. However, Gorkha ethnicity in India is not of recent origin. It did maintain a colonial pedigree too. In that Gorkha movement appears as a historic occurrence having more than hundred years' legacy. On the contrary the conflict resolution initiatives taken so far in Indian subcontinent, in general and in case of Darjeeling hills, in particular are not many but practically few in number.

The attempts to resolve the growing ethno-regional conflicts in India remain by and large amenable to a single approach that presupposes the conflicts principally as political problems and hence attempts were made to resolve the same politically. Consequently, the several measures adopted so far to bring in ceasefire and peace in conflicting zones in India fall back upon such initiatives like political intervention and negotiating political power-sharing agreements, or initiation of new political structures. The recommendations of the States Reorganisation Commission (SRC), Constitutional recognition of language, the regional autonomy proposals, Sixth Schedule status, or the sub-state level autonomous district councils are some such strategies used so far to dissipate tensions and resolve issues effectively whenever conflicts have arisen in the wake of ethno-regional claims within the larger body polity of India. However, on certain particular occasions, the Indian state took resort to direct military intervention to dismantle domestic conflict permanently (Kashmir, Nagaland etc.). In a certain sense, the experience of conflict resolution measures in India does suggest that as if the ethno-regional conflicts and movements are more a law and order problem and hence the recurrent need is to discipline the unruly subjects according to the pedagogic substance of an archetypical nation state, which disapproves by and large the social and cultural plurality of individual minds and souls. The ethnic conflict resolution measures undertaken by the government attempted to function more as an apparatus of power by virtue of the field of visibility in which communities were to be located, each in their respective places for a centralised and unseen observer.

The experience of Gorkha movement throughout its more than hundred years' history has been reflective of two major claims: firstly, an aspiration to govern themselves without jeopardizing the sovereignty of the nation-state (i.e. 'self-determination without secession'); and secondly, the urge to recognize collective rights and almost all salient cultural and social issues that earmarked their distinctions and distinctiveness from an inescapable 'other' (i.e. 'politics of culture', 'identity' and 'recognition'). Although the conflict resolution measures have been able to fulfil, at least initially, the aspiration of self-government of the contending parties, they fail to meet the challenges posed by politics of identity and recognition. Consequently, conflict resolution measures in deeply divided societies like India fail to usher in peace and tranquillity in a sustainable manner.

The Government, however, has remained engaged in settling down Darjeeling imbroglio not only when it turned violent but also in such situations when the movement was more or less peaceful. It is interesting to note in this context that available studies on Darjeeling [like those of Subba (1992), Timsina (1992), Kar (1999), Samanta (2000) among others] despite having made significant contribution in understanding ethnic phenomena in Darjeeling hills have avoided making any assessment regarding the peace keeping initiatives. Available narratives of Gorkhaland have documented the track record of violence (e.g. Samanta, 2000) and the historical development of the movement with enough detail (e.g. Subba, 1992). Undoubtedly, such analyses pinpointed the strength of Gorkhaland as a specific case of an ethnic movement. Nevertheless, the issue of conflict resolution or for that matter such crucial questions like what were the definite strands (i.e. approaches) and steps (i.e. the strategies of conflict resolution) the state has taken recourse to while dealing with the overall dynamics of Gorkha ethnicity and movement of Darjeeling hills, are completely glossed over, if not ignored. More particularly such issues like: did the state responded to the Gorkha movement in equal terms especially when we do know that the movement has been continuing for more than a century and obviously followed both a violent and a non-violent warpath? What was the overall treatment Gorkhaland movement received from the part of the state? How to conceptualise it? How to theorise relationship between ethnicity and the state? All these are significant areas of inquiry particularly in the treatment of Gorkha problem not merely as a case of ethnicity but as a significant example that could well set the tune of the study of ethnic conflict resolution in a micro perspective in deeply divided societies like India. This is not to claim that the present study has drawn attention to a virgin field. Rather what is novel is its approach towards an issue that has already been considered in some detail. Precisely, the present effort is but an attempt to fulfil the above posed academic void (in relation to Gorkha ethnicity) by analysing the pros and cons of peace initiatives and conflict resolution measures adopted and exercised by the state in the context of Darjeeling hills and thereby to arrive at a micro-level understanding of ethnic conflict resolution and peace keeping measures in Indian situation.

Although scholarly works with particular reference to Darjeeling's ethnic conflict and conflict resolution measures are rarely available, there is no dearth of literature on the conceptual and theoretical aspects of conflict and peace resolution initiatives with reference to Indian situation. It would not be out of place to pay attention to some of the recent works of this genre.

Baruah (2010) in his recently edited Ethnonationalism collective poses the question: "How is India doing vis-à-vis the challenge of managing its exceptional diversity?" The essays presented in the volume have answered differently to the problem posed by the editor. For example, Kanti Bajpai suggested that a mix of state violence and political compromise with militant groups has been successful at least in the sense that India has not splintered. Gurharpal Singh questioned the conventional wisdom about India's successful record in managing diversity. Sumit Ganguly warned of the dangers of using the army against particular ethnic groups in poly-ethnic states like India. Ganguly further argued that insurgency in India, in general and Kashmir, in particular, arose out of a process of political mobilisation that was juxtaposed with steady institutional decay. Atul Kohli while analysing the trend of ethno-nationalist movements in India has argued that such movements followed an inverse 'U' curve: heightened mobilisation of group identities are followed by negotiations, and eventually such movements decline as exhaustion sets in, some leaders are repressed, others are co-opted, and a modicum of genuine power-sharing and mutual accommodation between the movement and the Central and State authorities is reached. The inverted 'U' curve explains Tamil Nadu situation rather well and even Sikh ethnonationalism can be explained through this model, argues Kohli. However, there is doubt whether the inverse 'U' curve model can help us appreciate Darjeeling situation, which in fact, showed a curvilinear pattern of growth.

J.S. Chima (2010) in his book on Sikh separatism attempted to develop a coherent and consistent theory for explaining the rise and decline of Sikh insurgency in India. The central argument of Chima's thesis is that internal disunity and competition between state elites often contribute to the rise of violent ethno-nationalism, and their internal unity and coordinated action can conversely help dampen violent ethno-nationalist movements.

What would be the possible answer to the recurrent dilemma faced by the policy-makers over the ideal mix up of development and military approaches to contain insurgency is the central theme of another major collective on counter-insurgency edited by Baruah (2009). While one of the contributors of the collective pointed out that development in north-eastern India means a little more than externally delivered economic packages which can be translated through various backdoor means and leakages, at the soonest possible into hard cash, another contributor argues that neither development nor a military fix can achieve peace in north-eastern region. Only concerted efforts to establish the rule of law, a system of accountability, and faith in the institutions of government can break the cycle of violence, the authors say. Bethany Lacina, one of the contributors, suggested that the influence and endurance of insurgency in the north-eastern region are because of the fact that armed groups are embedded in the workings of the north-eastern civilian politics which makes it difficult for politicians or bureaucrats to act independently of the rebels. This finding seems to be the case in Darjeeling hills too.

Benedikter (2009) has produced a useful short guide on autonomy movements in South Asia and attempted to show, through various case studies, how such ethnic conflicts were solved through self-government measures. Although the guide includes a separate chapter (Chapter 23) on Darjeeling situation (written by the editor himself) and covers the recent eventualities of Gorkhaland movement but it hardly maintains any conclusive statement regarding the effective step to promulgate peace in future Darjeeling. However, elsewhere the book did count on the potentiality of autonomy as a device for regional democratic self-government and minority rights protection. The case studies available in this book help gain a synoptic view on the contemporaneous problems of ethnic conflicts in South Asia and the possible ways to resolve such conflicts amicably through autonomy measures of different sorts.

The Context

The Gorkhas are spread all over the subcontinent; however, the present study is concerned precisely with the Gorkhas located in the Darjeeling hills and their claims to have separate state of their own. Darjeeling is the northern most district of the State of West Bengal containing hills and plains regions. Three hill subdivisions (namely Darjeeling Sadar, Kurseong and Kalimpong) constitute the hill portion of the district while Siliguri subdivision represents the plains part of the district. Until recently the demand for a separate state in the name of Gorkhaland covered uphill portion of the district only. With the passage of time the territorial jurisdiction of the much hyped Gorkhaland State went on increasing. Along with the hills the proposed territorial limits of the Gorkhaland movement in contemporary days claims to cover the areas of Teari (located in the plains areas of the district of Darjeeling) and Dooars (located in adjacent district of Jalpaiguri). The following map (Fig. 1.1) indicates the territorial limits of the proposed State of Gorkhaland.

The Gorkhaland agitation was built, as its name indicates around Gorkha ethnic identity. Its perception of the problems of the ethnic Nepalis in India differs from that of the leadership in Sikkim, and so do their political strategies (Dube, 1997: 194). However, it would be erroneous to conceive of the demand for a separate state called for that matter ethnic movements revolve. In ethnic situations, such as in Darjeeling hills, the state in fact, plays a dual role. It can instigate and aggravate the ethnic problem and at the same time it has the capacity of containing the conflict that it provoked. In case of Darjeeling hills the relationship between the State and Gorkha/Nepali ethnicity has been found to be intimate from the very beginning. The Colonial State structure has well maintained the difference of the hills from the plains for politico-economic reasons. The administrative arrangements of different sorts were implemented so as to fulfil their own imperial interest in the hills. The people of Darjeeling hills from the very beginning were thus trained in the logic of difference but hardly realised the hidden colonial design of exploitation camouflaged as differential administrative arrangements. In a certain sense, the British had left Darjeeling by successfully invoking the idea into minds of the hill people that Darjeeling has been a segregated tract from the mainstream of Bengal.

The hill masses have actively participated in the democratic governance (there were exceptions too in this regard) of the country since Independence. However, this hardly implies that they have left their claims for separating their tract from the rest of West Bengal. Even though the post-colonial state structure is different from its colonial predecessor on the ground that it discontinued the colonial designs of exclusion and hence exploitation, the contending groups have often charged the post-colonial State as 'neo-colonial' on the pretext that it hardly takes heed of their claims. State run welfare and developmental activities on the one hand and the percolation of political power through the different democratic institutions of governance in post-independent era, on the other hand have made the ethnically conscious groups aware regarding the strength of ethnicity. Ethnicity thus has been continuously written and re-written within these processual arrangements of state welfarism and political power. Gorkhaland movement is no exception to this trend. The different demands the movement has raised over the years can be understood within these processual linkages of state and power.

Methodological Concerns

Dwelling upon interviews, observations, and secondary data analysis the present study attempted to arrive at a critical understanding of conflict resolution initiatives taken place with respect to the question of Gorkhaland movement. The in-depth understanding of the peace building efforts initiated by the State and the responses of the people towards the same requires a thorough knowledge of the internal dynamics of the local society and culture. This has been undertaken through repeated visits to the hills and also gleaned out of the experience of the present researcher's decade long association with the problem and the area.

In fact, the question of methodology depends much upon the conceptual frame one intends to pursue while analysing the problem at hand. The conceptual framework tells us much about how to approach and contextualise the problem of study, what to investigate, how to investigate, and how to design the whole fact finding programme. Thus the question how we should approach the issues of conflict, peace and conflict resolution initiatives constituted the very first step to work out a methodological stand for the present study.

Peace is a normal condition of human society characterised by a relatively high degree of interpersonal harmony that renders a commitment to avoid violence of any sort. Conflict similarly is also a normal aspect of all societies although it implies incompatible needs, deeds and desires leading towards interpersonal/group antagonism, rivalry and often hostile encounters too. The point is that no society can remain all the time peaceful or conflict ridden. Both peace and conflict are relative social condition and stability in either term is neither feasible nor even desirable. Conflict resolution measures in this sense involve such strategies which aim at maintaining the relativity of both conflict and peace in a desirable manner. Peace initiatives thus do not suggest the complete dismissal of conflict in order to achieve eternal peace. The study has not considered the terms like peace or conflict in any fundamental sense. Ethnic conflicts do involve fierce battle, and often hostile manner of group rivalry figured out in violent terms but even in such situations too peace is not desirable if it attempts to eliminate any of the contending parties. This means peace could be gained and conflicts would be resolved in a meaningful sense if the measures protect the interests of the either party and provide the scope for the full blown growth of human capacities without any barrier or hindrance.

Having said all these, the methodological stand for the present study becomes clear enough. That is to say in other words, the relevance of both the ideas of peace and conflict needs to be judged from the vantage point of the state and government and at the same time from the vantage point of the people's perception regarding the same. Both the perspectives are necessary in the sense that both reveal different predilections regarding the same issue. And through a proper sociological analysis of these differential viewpoints a workable solution to the problem of peace building could be well founded. In an attempt to grasp the modalities of the differential perceptions of both the state and the people, fieldwork and secondary data analysis have been made.

For collecting primary data a detailed questionnaire was prepared and circulated among more than fifty individuals (fifty-seven in actual number). The respondents were purposively selected using the criteria of sex (out of 57 respondents 37 were males and 20 were females) and occupation (17 male teachers, 8 employed males, 12 male students, 5 employed females and 15 female students constituted the universe of 57 respondents). The questionnaire was specially designed for the educated persons alone and in majority of the cases the respondents were found to be tied up with some variety of associations available in the local society. In a certain sense sincere efforts were thus made to cover the viewpoints of civil society members and as a matter of fact all of the respondents were having at least graduation as minimum educational background. All the respondents did maintain close connection with the hills (either because the hills is their native place, or that they do have close relatives in the hills and make frequent movement to the hills and feel concerned regarding what happens there in the hills). Covering the viewpoint of the hill people through the questionnaire was made personally by spending the month of June 2011. However, field assistants were engaged in collecting data particularly from the plains region. Collection of questionnaire was completed by the end of July 2011. As such the field trip was significant in the sense that it was completed during that phase of time when the recent conflict containment strategy Gorkhaland Territorial Administration (GTA) was just on its offing and the issue has been made so popular that even a child would have known that something was going on in the name of GTA. For consulting Government documents visits in District Collector's office have been made. Besides libraries of North Bengal University, Centre for Himalayan Studies, Ratan Tata Library of Delhi School of Economics, Delhi University have been visited for the purpose of collecting secondary data on the issues of peace, conflict and conflict resolution. Close scrutiny of everyday eventualities has also been made through content analysis of available news reports published in local and national news dailies.

There are three principal modes of narration popular in social science research, viz. 'ethnography', 'thick description', and 'stylised facts'. Ethnography is a preferred mode for anthropological research providing the every detail of the life cycle of a tribe, or a community. Thick description is also preferred by those who attempt to narrate the research problem in splendid detail but is sceptical of cross-case theorisation. Concentrating on the 'essentials', stylised facts as a mode of narration tends to present a disembodied and linear narrative. That is to say, it presents a selection of facts first and present the analysis later (Varshney, 2002: 21). The present study intends to follow neither the methods of ethnographic detail, or 'thick description', nor even the format called 'stylised facts'. However, the endeavour throughout the whole study would be rather to use the various sources of data more in the form of narration that aimed at amalgamating the facts with interpretations. In true sense the format of narration for the present study would stand in between the three principal methodological strands (as discussed above) popular in social science research.

In the present study an attempt has been made to arrive at a critical understanding of the peace keeping measures undertaken so far to mitigate the problem of Gorkha ethnicity and movement in Darjeeling Hills, West Bengal. This has been done by probing into the pros and cons of the movement vis-à-vis the response of the State as manifested in its deep seeded history and as emerged in the contemporaneous past. To put the matter in other words, the movement in its long drawn history has raised several issues and that the State also responded variously towards such burgeoning claims. The book contains six chapters and in the following pages the issue of conflict resolution has been critically estimated both with analytical rigour and with empirical data culled out from the biography of the Gorkha Movement. Finally, the study attempted to raise the plea for an alternative approach while thinking in terms of peace and conflict containment in liberal democracies like that of our own.

With the help of a detailed analysis of the event structure of Gorkhaland Movement further efforts were made to answer the grave question that: why ethnic conflicts do survive in Darjeeling hills despite several efforts to resolve the same have been made time to time? In the course of analysis the present study also attempted to throw some light on the possibility of developing an alternative approach grounded on sociological reasoning towards the issue of conflict resolution. This has been done against the backdrop of a detailed analysis of Darjeeling's Gorkhaland Movement which served the purpose of being a pointer to the fault lines involved in the path of settling the rather emotive issue covering community sentiments, regional consciousness, and cultural-historical lineages all at once. The study has shown in clear terms that conflict resolution strategies worked out to resolve Gorkha imbroglio were out and out political in nature and piecemeal in approach. The study ends up with a rather pessimistic prognosis and arrived at a conclusion that the way Gorkha Movement has been handled so far by the State can hardly foster sustainable peace and tranquillity. However, it is also proposed that there is scope for working out strategies with due emphasis on the social concerns that the movement has upheld but somehow got delinked in the process of devising strategies to resolve the problem. The study strongly argues against the tendency of the liberal nation state to view ethnic loyalty in contradistinction to national loyalty. The study also raises the argument that the missing link between ethnic loyalty and national loyalty can be established by a different approach that, in fact, poses a challenge both towards the liberal expectancy of peace and tranquillity on the one hand and the very foundational logic of liberal bourgeois democratic state, on the other. It is proposed that the real threat lies neither in the conflicting claims nor even in the violent gestures that the Gorkhas have shown but perhaps in the attempt that nullifies the significance of 'us-them' divide in the name of forging a universal 'we'. Instead of 'forceful assimilation' due recognition of claims raised by different stakeholders of the movement may help us derive policies/measures directed towards 'integrative peace'.

Chapter Outline

The present study throughout its six chapters has elaborated different aspects of conflict containment keeping in view Gorkhaland movement as a test case. The second chapter deals with the conceptual issues involved in the understanding and analysis of peace work. Global as well as national level experience of conflict resolution measures have been critically estimated in order to pinpoint the necessity of devising an alternative analytical framework. From third chapter onwards specific attention was put towards tracing out the genealogy of state response towards Gorkha ethnicity starting from the colonial days. The fourth chapter specifically locates the violent turn of the movement and change of stand of the State towards handling the situation in Darjeeling hills. The chapter covers up the eventualities leading towards the formation of Darjeeling Gorkha Hill Council (DGHC) as the first such experiment initiated by the State outside Sixth Schedule areas. Fifth chapter emphasizes on the twists and turns taken place in the response of the State and the development of the movement during post-DGHC phase. Sixth chapter hinges on the contemporary experience of conflict resolution taken shape in the form of the new tripartite agreement called Gorkhaland Territorial Administration (GTA). A social forecasting has been made on the possible outcome of the new treaty signed recently to resolve Darjeeling problem once again. Chapter seven in lieu of arriving at a conclusion attempts to expand such arguments which may lead towards developing further courses of fresh analysis. In order to make the study thoroughly updated the Postscript has been included. The Postscript has been prepared keeping in view the very recent developments taken place in the area under study.

In fact, the critical analysis of conflict resolution measures with particular reference to Darjeeling situation is overdue. Since Darjeeling hills has not only experienced the continuation of an ethnic movement for more than a century but also the region experienced war of nerves, severe tension, violence, enough bloodsheds, loss of life and resources in the wake of Gorkhaland Movement that turned violent in the 1980s. Again a new arrangement has recently been agreed upon by the conflicting parties on the one hand and the State and Central Government on the other, which have finally led towards the formation of the new set up called the GTA. The Gorkhaland Territorial Administration (GTA) has started its march with the expectations of all-round peace and development in the Darjeeling hills. Within such a crucial juncture the significance of the present study could hardly be brushed aside.

NOTES

1. Vide Appendix I for a detailed chronology of the movement.

Other Books of Interest

T.B. SUBBA, A.C. SINHA, G.S. NEPAL and D.R. NEPAL (Eds.)
Indian Nepalis: Issues and Perspectives

K.L. PRADHAN
Thapa Politics in Nepal

ANJOO SHARAN UPADHYAYA (Ed.)
Nepal in Transition to Democracy

J. TALBOYS WHEELER
History of India: And of the Frontier States of Afghanistan, Nepal and Burma

B.B. KUMAR
Problems of Ethnicity in the North East

OLIVER THORNE MILLER
Little People of Asia

SIR WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER
A Brief History of The Indian Peoples

KHEMRAJ SHARMA
Gorkhas in the Wilderness: A Study in North East India

J.V. HLUNA (Ed.)
History and Ethnic identity Formation in North-East India

CONCEPT PUBLISHING COMPANY (P) LTD.

A/15&16, Commercial Block, Mohan Garden New Delhi-110 059

Ph. : 25351460, 25351794

Fax : +91-11-25357109

Email: publishing@conceptpub.com Website : www.conceptpub.com

Showroom: Building No. 4788-90, Street No. 23, Ansari Road,
Darya Ganj, New Delhi-110 002

Ph. 23272187

